

This dynamic one-day conference may challenge everything you know about the Health and Social Care. Integrated Care may be the largest and most radical strategic reform in the history of the health and social care. There is the potential for system-wide change that will radically improve health and social care delivery. And there are also risks!

- Understand the national vision for integrated care systems and the implications for your service.
- Discover the nature of system leadership for integrated care.
- Identify the type of professional leadership required for operational success in integrated care systems.
- Learn how integrated care is developing in Greater Manchester Combined Authority, Dorset, and South Yorkshire and Bassetlaw Integrated Care Systems.
- Hear about what is happening in Europe to develop more integrated health and social care systems.
- Fully understand the Political, Legislative, Financial and Regulatory issues.

You will also have the opportunity to actively participate in a series of Think Tanks. These collaborative, co-creation events, will allow you to actively work with other delegates to help develop the vision of how integrated care will deliver better services for the UK population.

Faculty of Health and Wellbeing

The Faculty of Health and Wellbeing is one of Sheffield Hallam University's four, faculties. We are the largest health and social care education provider in England providing an outstanding learning experience for almost 9,000 students. Our work encompasses biosciences and chemistry, allied health professions, nursing and midwifery, social work, physician associates, leadership and management, and sport - supported by around 600 academic, research and professional service staff.

We focus on education and training for students who can go on to be professionals in health and social care, sport and biomedical sciences.

We also supply excellent research, training and expertise for a host of external clients, organisations and businesses. We are leaders in the use of state-of-the-art technology to support our teaching. For example using augmented reality -computerised applications that simulate a variety of physiological process and real-life complex health and care scenarios that require integrated solution-focused approaches from learners. We have extensive sports facilities at the Sheffield Hallam Sports Park and the Sheffield Hallam City Athletics Stadium.

Our approach to partnership working is important to both our education and research and we are particularly proud of our excellent relationships with local Health and Social care providers.

There are five academic departments in the faculty:

- Department of Allied Health Professions
- Department of Biosciences and Chemistry
- Department of Nursing and Midwifery
- Academy of Sport and Physical Activity
- Department of Social Work, Social Care and Community Studies.

Introducing our New Integrated Curriculum

An integrated approach to training the health and social care workforce of the future

Sheffield Hallam University are key contributors to innovative changes occurring across the health and social care landscape, contributing regionally and nationally through our education, research and knowledge exchange activities to enhance the quality of people's lives. In recognition of the changing workforce needs of our Health and Social Care partners, the Faculty of Health and Wellbeing is proactively redesigning all of its health and social care education provision across 11 professional groups to create a pre-registration Integrated Care Curriculum.

The Integrated Care Curriculum prepares our graduate workforce to innovate and collaborate in partnership with service users, to meet the needs of the public within an integrated care system. Taking advantage of our unique position, we are creating innovative, impactful learning experiences where students learn with, from and about other professionals throughout their courses to enhance services. The fact that we are the largest health and social care provider in England, allows us to bring integrated ways of working to life in the classroom, so learning happens across a full range of health, social care and wellbeing professions. We are continuing to explore learning across biosciences and chemistry; allied health; nursing and midwifery; social work; physician associates; leadership and management and sport. No other university offers this much diversity when learning to work across traditional boundaries.

This enhanced learning experience allows students to develop great team working skills, to develop their understanding about the different contributions professionals make to the care of service users/patients/families and communities. Each professional graduate uses a philosophy of integration to always act with service users to understand... "what matters to you?" This integrated approach is influencing, leading and changing what it means to be a Hallam graduate working within integrated care systems.

In taking this integrated approach to all that we do, we are co-creating courses in close collaboration with service users and employers, ensuring that the professionals of tomorrow are fully prepared for the integrated health and social care landscape of today.
